MASSACHUSETTS.

Greenhalge Gets One of Greatest Pluralities Ever Known in the State.

The republican tidal wave swept over Massachusetts and gave Gov. Greenhalge one of the greatest pluralities ever known in the past.

Election day just passed will remain for a long time a memorable one in account of the severe snow storm that ushered it in, in New England, completely demoralizing traffic, hindering travel, interrupting communication, laying low telegraph wires, and creating sad havoc with all arrangements to gather election returns. The storm which seemed to continue its fury to New England was a regular "old timer" and completely paralyzed the telegraph service. No communication was had with New York until ten o'clock in the morning and for several hours was frequently interrupted. For a greater part of the day the eastern was completely shut off from the western part of the state, and returns have all been meager and always delayed.

It was a republican victory although the vote generally was light. Good gains were shown over the vote of last year. Frederick T. Greenhalge elected governor of Massachusetts by a handsome plurality, and made a gain over his vote in '93. The democrats carried Boston, but the vote fell off about fourteen per cent. Russell's plurality became about 3000. Several arrests were made in Boston for repeating.

New York experienced a general turnover and a good deal of surprise. Tammany was completely turned down and relegated to the rear. Morton was elected governor by over 100,000. Strong republican, defeated Hugh Grant, Tammany, for Mayor. A large vote was polled. In New Hampshire the election was quiet although there was considerable cutting and shoving of ballots. Both for governor and legislature were decided. In many southern and western states, a very heavy vote was cast, and in all others a good one. It was as much of a republican sweep in the west as in the east.
